Australian Centre for Child Protection

The Australian Centre for Child Protection is a joint initiative of the Commonwealth Government (Department of Innovation, Industry, Science and Research) and the University of South Australia. Government funding is provided for a 10 year period. The University has undertaken to locate and support the Centre within the Division of Education, Arts and Social Sciences. A National Advisory Council, representing a range of disciplines and key stakeholders, is a resource and a sounding board for the Centre.

The Centre is a focused initiative with a small professional staff. Core staff were appointed as of September 2005, under the leadership of Professor Dorothy Scott, the foundation Chair and Director.

Establishment of the Centre reflects increased community concern for the welfare of children, particularly those at risk of abuse or neglect. It also recognises the need for sustained coordination and support to the diverse and significant range of child protection initiatives undertaken by government, educational institutions and community organisations. The Centre has been established at an opportune time. Inter-government and inter-sectoral processes in child protection are increasing and research has the potential to underpin a knowledge based agenda for change and improvement.
